Two blissful books in which we come to know, through the voices of the child narrators, about the very special relationship that exists between these children and their grandparents. Grandmother's lap is the special place where this little black girl finds comfort in times of stress: when she is feeling poorly, when a storm rages outside, or when the cat is missing.

In Grandfather and I, a little black boy tells us about a walk through the woods with Grandfather. The first person narrative is skilfully paced -the leisurely woodland spreads with their repeated sentences are cleverly contrasted with the more hurried descriptions on alternate spreads.

Caring and sharing, tenderness and love shine through from both words and pictures and Ormerod's watercolours capture the emotions perfectly.
